

“... If we take as the starting point for our search for truth the fundamental — albeit hypothetical — assumption that there is an essential unity underlying multiplicity...

... it is logical to conclude that what we see and experience on the relative plane ... is not reality but an appearance of reality, a reflection, a distortion, a fragment of an immense, true Reality, which lies beyond our current understanding.

... a profound Reality of things

... we live in a world of illusory appearances ...

... We live in a sort of “artificial scenario” ... that conceals the true nature of things, and the truth will always be unattainable for humankind, because the means at its disposal—namely, the senses and the mind—are limited and illusory.

... we use limited and incomplete means that can never lead us to the truth, since they cannot, on their own, go beyond a certain limit of perception ...

... the impression of matter’s solidity is an illusion ...”
